OPINIONS OF THE
PRESS OF THE FORMER EDITIONS OF

FREELING'S

POCKET BOOK OF ETIQUETTE,

AND

Vade Mecum of the Observances of Society.

“This is a very pretty little book, and does much credit not only to the author, but also to the printer and publisher. It abounds with excellent maxims and observations, and shows that the author has mixed much with society, and is fully competent to give instruction. We cordially recommend it to the notice of our readers.”—Standard, May 9.

“We can confidently recommend this unique and intelligent little work to the patronage of the book-reading public. It may be studied as much for the practical lessons of wisdom it contains, as for the admonitions it offers on the usages and observances of good society.”—Telegraph, May 10.

“We confidently recommend this pretty little book; and feel assured that all who purchase it will lay out their money well.”—Chronicle, May 6.

“This neat little book carries its recommendation in its title. It is a sort of pocket manual of good breeding. All its rules display the most excellent taste and judgment.”—Albion, May 15.

“This beautiful little book really deserves all the credit which our contemporaries have given it. The title of the book explains its object, and, we believe, as much and as valuable instruction is contained in its pages as could well be compressed into a similar space.”—Journal, May 20.

“A pleasant and useful little book; it is written with good sense and good taste, and will repay perusal.”—Times, May 23.

“A little book bearing this title, has just emanated from the Liverpool press, which does infinite credit to publisher, printer, and author. It is full of good advice, and is a perfect gem in appearance.”
Sunday Times, May 28, 1837.

“This elegant and instructive work is worth its weight in gold; its precepts are invaluable.”—Review, May, 1837,

AND NUMEROUS OTHERS.

Guide.

DEDICATED BY PERMISSION TO THE DIRECTORS OF THE COMPANY.

The work contains a complete description of every thing worthy of attention on the Line—of the Gentlemen's Seats, Villas, Towns, Villages, Rivers, Markets and Fairs. An account of the Churches, Endowments, —Livings, and Patrons—a list of Races—and an account of the Hunting and Angling Stations, near the Line. With a Map shewing the length of every excavation and embankment—the exact distance from one station to another—the gradients of the rails—the radius of the curves—and a section of the ground previous to the commencement of the rail-road operations.

Bound in Cloth, and lettered, price 2s. 6d.

Railway Magazine, (December,) thus says, "this little work correctly describes every object and place of interest on or near the line. It contains a neat history of the undertaking—and has an excellent map, upon a large scale, which shows the towns, stations, gradients, curves, cuttings, embankments throughout; also the gentlemen's seats near the line."

The Liverpool Mercury thus notices it:—"This is the most complete work of the kind; the promises of the title-page are faithfully kept; no traveller should be without it."

The Herald thus speaks of the book:—"It is evident that considerable industry has been employed in collecting the information contained in the work. The descriptions of the towns are accurate. The author, too, has been materially assisted in his task by the directors, which stamps the preliminary history as authentic."

The Morning Advertiser says, "This elegant little volume will be found remarkably interesting, and when the traveller has been put down at any of the towns, he will here find as much information relative to its Public Institutions—Customs—Trade—Hotels—Coach-fares, &c. &c. as is often contained in a large directory."

The Spectator:—"The work is written in a very succinct and readable form, and gives an account of the works, regulations, &c. &c., and an itinerary of the places through which the line passes."

The Liverpool Journal thus speaks of it. "Mr. Arthur Freeling has written this work with his usual judgment; in a small compass it contains every thing interesting to the traveller, in the way of Fares—Mails—Post-Offices—Steam-Packets—Statistics—Topography, and all the multitudinous points on which travellers require information."

The Mining Journal says "The work is accompanied by a very superior map of the Railway, to which Mr. Locke, the engineer, has contributed much valuable information. We recommend it to the Railway Traveller, who will find therein all the information he can desire; and we may observe, this is the first of a series of Guides on which Mr. Freeling is now engaged, embracing all the great Railways in the Kingdom."

The Liverpool Albion thus notices the work:—"This is a handsome and compact volume of convenient pocket size, written by Arthur Freeling. It is dedicated, by permission, to the directors of the company. A large and beautiful map of the Railway, including the Liverpool and Manchester Line, is placed opposite the title-page, and will be found exceedingly useful. Ample details are given of every thing likely to prove interesting on the Line, with full accounts of the fairs, regulations, and a complete description of every part of the railroad; including the views—Noblemen and Gentlemen's seats, and the towns and villages near which it passes. The work also contains much information which is not less amusing than instructive."
